LEOLA;

THE MYSTERIOUS RANGER A Tale of the Mexican War.

By T. Hamilton Vananda. ther of " Allela," " The Miller Patriot," "Wild 'ermsi," " Almoni," " Jessie Wharton," sto.

Leols was prepared for this, but she was not prepared to accept the alternative, although she had no distrust of any harm intended her.— She began to enquire after friends and acquaintarces, but learned that they had all vacsted the city. She waited until night ere she acquiesced in the plan, and then, when all attempts to hear from Travis had failed, she reluctantly yielded, and started at day light for the convent of St. Isabel, with a letter to the lady Superior, sister Francisca, recommending her to her care and protection. Mariano accompanied her on her journey, and two postillions, with accredited passports from General Taylor, were sent along

The heart of Leola was very and, as, for the second time, she bade cdies to her native city, and as she thought of Travis, the tears welled into her eyes. What had become of him? Had he fallen into the enemy's hands, or been murdered by them in some scouting expedition? Or if not, would be ever ascertain her where abouts, or seek her out during the war, or when It was over? Then came the thought that she would never see him more-that she was now leaving the world for ever, and that life was henceferth to be a blank and painful void, made up of the dull monotony of convent life, where the unsatisfied and loving beart was to learn the lesson of self sacrifice !

And while these things flitted through her mind and weighed upon her heart, the carriage rolled rapidly onward, leaving the city far behind them, the sun rose beautifully over the plains, and glittered in the distant Rio del Norte. The morning were slowly away, and Leola felt that they were travelling with unusual velocity. I: was about ten o'clock, as they neared the little hamlet of Los Castros, that she was almost thrown from her seat by the sudden stopping o

"W hat is the matter?" she cried, as she recovered her position.
"Robbers!" gasped Mariano.

O no, my lady, only some friends who wish to bear you company," said a bold, well known voice, at the window.

"Sener Castillias!" cried Leola, aghast. "Ay, fair Senora! you thought to escape me, did you? But Monks and Cavaliers can plot as well as the Senorita Cas; and you will find the Castle of Don Eduardo Casti lias quite as comfortable as the Convent of St. Isabel !"

But Leola did not hear his words. She had fainted, and lay helpless in the arms of the frightened Mariano.

"Come," said Castillias, addressing the latter, as he lifted our heroine from the vehicle, and placed her upon a horse in charge of one of the men. !'Come! you shall keep your mistress company, if you mount a horse and go quietly if not, I'll end your life with this pistol, and let you rot on the road !"

As he spoke, he presented the weapon at Mariano, who threw up her hands, and signified her willingness to go.

"Away! and obey orders!" cried the chief, to the two men, who had charge of the females. They turned their horses into the wood, or the left, and rode rapidly away. Scarcely had they disappeared from sight, when the sound of a body of horse was heard coming up the rode. "Ah! what is this? Pursuit!" cried the Guerilla. "Postillions drive on as though nothing had happened. We'll to the chapparel, and teach these Americanos a lesson!"

The postillions cracked their whips, and the carriage horses set off at a rattling pace, while the bandit and his score of men, vanished in the formed, before a dozen horsemen, dressed in the Texan uniform, rose over the distant acclivity, and as they beheld the flying carriages, they uttered a shout that made the welkin ring. "Tuere is our prize, comrades! on!" cried

Travis, as he pointed his sword toward the vehicle. "We'll soon overtake it, at this rate, I reckon," said Kit Galen.

They came on at a terrible pace, for their borses were of fine mettie, and the riders were fearless men. They saw the object of their chase before them—it seemed within their grasp—and each man felt his heart beat faster, and his breath grow thick and labored, as he thought the chase at a close. They passed the wood, and were sweeping by a piece of lowland, overgrown with mesquite bushes, when suddenly, like the opening of a fan, forty horsemen wheeled into the road in front of them, and fired!

It was like magic! Three Rangers tumbled from their horses, while the right arm of Kit

Galen felt to his side.
"Upon them!" cried Travis, maddened to desperation. And drawing his revolver, he instantly sent four to their last account; then, grasping his sword tightly, he was about to plunge forward, when a voice in the rear cried:
"Surrender!"
He turned to look from whence it came, and beheld the Guerilla Chief, Castillias, with twenty mounted men, standing within as many yards of his rear. At the same instant-and before he could reply—there was a report in his front; his horse plunged forward, fatally wounded, and threw his rider senseless upon the road. The rest surrendered at discretion.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE GRANGE MAN-A STRANGE DISCOVERY.

It was a bright afternoon in August, about three months after the incidents narrated in the last chapter. General Taylor had pushed his camp as far as Walnut Springs, seven miles from Monterey. Camargo and Caidareta had offered no obstacle in his way, and he had made a clean sweep, and triumphant march from Point Isabel to the mountain passes of the in-terior. He had paured at Walnut Springs for a few reinforcements to come up, before attacking Santa Anna in his mountain chained city.

It was a bright August evening as we have eaid, and a party of soldiers belonging to the New York Regiment were lounging and playing in front of their quarters—as was their general custom when off duty—when their attention we arrested by an election. tion was arrested by an old man leading a donkey loaded with oranges, which were carried in panniers on each side of the animal.

"Come, boys, let us have some sport," cried one of them, named Charley Langford, who was noted for his froliesome disposition, and who had been oftener in the guard-house than any other man in the regiment. "I want some oranges," he continued. "Hillo, Señor, stop your migratory establishment, and give us a

The old man seemed somewhat reluctant to stop, but the soldiers gathered around his don-key, and he was forced to yield.

"How do you sell 'em per dozen?" arked

"That's just like you, Tim Clayton; any-body could tell you were raised to the grocery business," said Charley, who was coolly filling THE STOCK AND FIXTURES AND goodwill of a grocery and liquor store and 3 rooms for sale, now doing a good budness; to be sold cheap; rent $9 per month. Inquire on the premises, 299 East 12th st. his pockets, and passing the yellow fruit to others behind him.

"Jan'd Josepha! Benore Americance! I'm but a poor merchant," exclaimed the eld man.

140, yes, we would not ebest you for the world," said Charley Langford. "Tim, are you good at catching?"

"Excellent," said Tim; "I used to be cham pion of the Eagle Base Ball Club." "Good! then look out!" and before any one could interfere, Charley had tossed one side of the pannier over the donkey, and the whole came to the ground with a crasis, and the oranges flew in every direction. The soldiers, with a laughing shout, sprang among them, tossing each other from side to side, as they scrambled for their share. To be Continued.
